Healthcare delivery is a complex and rapidly evolving process, as the interaction between the healthcare provider, service users and their families is transformed by advances in diagnostic and therapeutic technology. Cancer patients may be at the point of greatest contact with healthcare, but the transition of the patient through their disease trajectory from the time of diagnosis is poorly documented. We examined the current state of documentation of cancer patients' journey through the UK's National Health Service (NHS), using the National Cancer Registration and Analysis Service database. All cancer registries in England and Wales contribute individual patient data to the Cancer Datawarehouse, which is an accurate and timely repository of information. Our analysis used data for all patients diagnosed and treated at services from 2005 to 2009, who were reported in the database as alive at final follow-up (31 December 2009). We examined data for 43 730 patients, and collated data on where they were first registered and by whom. Approximately 68% of patients received their initial diagnosis from secondary care (oncology/haematology/general medicine), with a further 21% and 11% treated at primary and community care, respectively. Patients transferred from primary to secondary care (21%) at a median time of 113 days following diagnosis. Nearly half (47%) of those initiating their care at secondary care did not receive their final follow-up care in that setting. Documentation of their pathway through the system was poor, with
