Field of the Invention The invention relates to a method for controlling at least one gas-blast switch having a number of primary air nozzles and a number of secondary air nozzles which are controllable separately from one another and which are opened and closed separately in the case of a pneumatic breakdown. The invention also relates to a control device for a gas-blast switch having a number of primary air nozzles and a number of secondary air nozzles which are controllable separately from one another and which are opened and closed separately in the case of a pneumatic breakdown. The invention further relates to a process for extinguishing a fire which is ignited in a controlled manner in the case of a pneumatic breakdown in which a control device is provided for the gas-blast switch which is open and closed separately in the case of a pneumatic breakdown. A gas-blast switch of this type is known from DE 197 02 208 B4. In this known gas-blast switch, the gas-blast switch with a pneumatic breakdown is opened and closed separately in the case of a pneumatic breakdown. There is no controlled extinguishing of the fire in the case of a pneumatic breakdown which is not only costly but is also unsafe in the case of fire extinguishing. DE 196 33 513 A1 discloses a method and a gas-blast switch which are characterized by the fact that in the case of a pneumatic breakdown, the gas-blast switch is closed at least in the area of a blast nozzle which is of particular importance and at least in the region of the remaining blast nozzles which do not have to be closed and which remain open. By this means, the extinguishing of the fire in the gas-blast switch is optimized and simplified. It is an object of the invention to further improve the process for extinguishing a fire and to further improve a

A potent secreted (toxigenic) version of Escherichia coli alpha-hemolysin that forms pores. The major secreted product of Escherichia coli, alpha-hemolysin (HlyA), is the most potent secreted protein toxin known. Despite its functional importance and toxicity, little is known about how HlyA functions. HlyA is a five-domain protein with a N-terminal periplasmic domain, two alpha-helical transmembrane domains, and a C-terminal cytoplasmic domain. HlyA assembles as a heptamer of beta-barrels to form a large beta-barrel pore. Recently, three homologs of HlyA, HlyB, HlyD, and HlyC, have been identified in E. coli and Salmonella spp., and all share extensive homology to HlyA. Here, we describe the production of a secretion-deficient mutant of HlyA that allows for the detection of a secreted protein toxin in vitro. We demonstrate that the secreted mutant toxin forms pores in artificial membranes. In the presence of Zn(2+) ions, we purified the secreted mutant toxin and used it to assay for HlyA activity in various cell types and mouse serum. Our results show that the secreted mutant toxin is a potent cytolytic toxin that is almost 10 times more potent than the wild-type toxin. We conclude that the secreted mutant toxin is an extremely potent toxin, and that the N-terminal periplasmic domain of HlyA is dispensable for cytolysis and pore formation.
