In this work, a combined experimental and theoretical study on the Mg/CaO-mediated hydrogenation of imines is reported. The imines were easily hydrogenated at ambient temperature to give the corresponding amines in nearly quantitative yields. DFT calculations showed that the mechanism involved in the hydrogenation of imines is similar to the one of ketones. Two hydrogen atoms are transferred to imines by a non-innocent mechanism in which Mg-bound oxo anions play a crucial role. The concerted protonation of a calcium atom on the oxygen of CaO together with protonations on an oxymetal hydride on Mg is the step which triggers the transfer of two hydrogen atoms. It is found that the hydrogenation of imines proceeds in a stepwise fashion, involving the transformation of the imine into an iminium intermediate, which is then hydrogenated by one of the two hydrogen atoms previously transferred to the imine. The intermediate iminium ion evolves to the corresponding amine with a concomitant conversion of oxalato into hydroxyoxalate (HO-Ca-O-C). The HO-Ca-O-C species also acts as the hydrogen atom donor to the hydroxy group of the protonated iminium 1d6a3396d6

What's New ✰⬚ Now you can host Discord chats in different IP addressQ: Is there a universal alternate carpal bone reference? I've never heard of such a reference. I have X-rayed a number of fractures of the hand, and every time I come across a fracture of the wrist I ask for a way to find the carpal bone I'm looking for. Are there any standard references? A: Usually it's the lunate bone (also called the first or distal carpal bone) that is fractured. It sits underneath the pisiform and the scaphoid. This is a picture of the wrist showing the lunate. It is located just underneath the pisiform (at the bottom of the image), and behind the scaphoid. Here is a picture of an antero-posterior view of the wrist. This view is useful for evaluating distal radius fractures (a common type of wrist fracture). Note that in this view the scaphoid sits on top of the lunate bone, so you can't see the lunate. Organic Foods May Increase Cancer Risk 13/08/2014 15:01 Many people assume that organic foods are healthier than the non-organic foods they are comparing them to, but a new study finds that eating more organic foods actually increases the risk of cancer. According to a study published in the Annals of Internal Medicine, compared to non-organic foods, organic foods increase the risk of cancer by a factor of 1.67. According to the study, two pounds of organically-grown foods eaten per day increased the risk of cancer by about six percent. The researchers reached this conclusion after assessing the health benefits of different foods, including those grown organically and those that are conventionally grown. For each pound of fruits, vegetables and whole grains that are conventionally grown, the average dieter eats 0.86 pounds of fruits, vegetables, and whole grains that are organically grown. This difference could account for the difference in cancer risk between organic and non-organic foods. In total, the researchers found that organic foods increased the risk of cancer by five percent on average. For example, eating two pounds of organic broccoli a day increases the risk of cancer by 10 percent. Overall, the researchers say that organic foods can provide additional cancer-fighting benefits. The team also found that eating organic foods may help reduce the risk of cardiovascular disease and diabetes. The researchers did not find that eating organic foods helped increase the risk of death, so the overall health
