Upregulation of metabolic enzymes during pigment deprivation in Chlamydomonas reinhardtii chloroplasts. During the photosynthetic growth of Chlamydomonas reinhardtii, chlorophyll concentration in the light is the main limiting factor for growth. To avoid toxicity in light, chloroplast maturation is arrested in the dark and is only resumed when light is restored. In this study, a systematic investigation of chloroplast enzymes that may be involved in regulating pigment synthesis during dark-to-light transition was performed. Three enzymes, the pyridoxal enzyme gamma-glutamyl-phosphate reductase (NADPH) (EC 1.4.1.8), the glutamine synthetase/glutamate synthase (EC 6.3.1.2), and the peroxisomal isocitrate oxidase (EC 1.1.14.22) were measured. For those, the response to the lack of two light signals (light irradiance and blue light) was monitored. NADPH activity was upregulated under light condition but not significantly after blue light deprivation. An increase in glutamate synthase activity was observed even in the absence of light, suggesting the existence of an endogenous signal. Isocitrate oxidase activity was downregulated in the dark and increased up to 50% of the light level. The change in glutamate synthase is probably a consequence of the concomitant increase in light-independent glutamine synthase activity (75%), together with the possible entry of the protein into the
