The market for enterprise collaboration applications has grown dramatically over the past five years. According to Gartner, "Coupled with the growth in the Internet and the widespread adoption of enterprise content management and collaboration tools, companies today are purchasing large numbers of collaboration software and services." Organizations are currently spending an estimated $1.9 billion annually on collaborative applications. The critical component of this growth is the widespread adoption of instant messaging within the enterprise. Enterprise IM solutions are mostly focused on making it easier for employees to collaborate when they are physically in the office or when they are disconnected. The key elements of enterprise IM are the ability for users to send text messages, audio and video calls, and share documents. Most enterprise IM solutions also provide presence and presence history, user list searching, and event/message scheduling. Most also have a meeting scheduling function as well.
