Given that PC speakers sometimes struggle to pump out of a full-length movie file, having a way to play it through headphones for optimum listening has become increasingly important. However, when watching a film or listening to music, a lot of PC users have a system that can only be used with a particular headset, and another that can only be used with a different one. If your system changes from one to the next, the sound it produces also switches. Asus' Aura Sync is probably the most significant thing to happen to PCs and headphones as far as consumers are concerned in recent years. The system synchronizes PC sound to a set of headphones. Using the system's "audio" button, it also synchronizes the desktop and the linked headphones. It does so by using the system's Realtek Audio device controller. The company's Aura Audio technology, meanwhile, gets the system to synchronize sound to a set of headphones. The first set of headphones is linked using an Asus-branded frequency technology. The system works with both sound cards and motherboard audio controllers, and is designed to support low-latency, high-quality sound. Although Asus says that Aura Sync can work even when the PC is on standby, that will only be possible if connected to a specific set of headphones. The Aura Sync program itself will continue to operate while the system is put into standby. The system can also be used to make the audio on a TV appear to come from a different location.
