I've done a little research on BPM-2, and I know that replication is a BPM functionality. This is the page where I got the information. But I'm not sure about the cost. To sum up: If I get 4 systems (each system with 1 GB RAM and 4 cores), can I use the hardware resources to run BPM for 7 days on the first system and then use the second one for the 7 days to run BPM? A: Yes, replication is a BPM feature and not a problem for hardware resources. In fact, BPM2 has a very high scalability (see Replication is used to set up shadow instances. These instances live on each system (however you define a system) and when a shadow instance wants to access data (or make a change), it sends a query to a primary instance. The primary instance can verify that the data is correct. In the event that the data is not correct, the primary will reply to the shadow instance with an error. Every system can have multiple instances. For example, every system can have a primary, a shadow, and a secondary. If the shadow wants to get the data, it sends a query to the primary. The primary verifies that the data is correct and responds. If the data is not correct, the primary responds with an

Windows: Mac: Additional Notes: Setting up the card in Windows was a little bit of a pain since it's not that easy to enable SLI on laptops. After an hour of searching, I came across an "out-of-the-box" compatibility setting in the Nvidia control panel, which I used to get it working. In Linux, SLI should be handled by the "Xorg" module, which has the capability of detecting multiple graphics cards and using the most powerful one. Unfortunately, it seems to be a
